the 1990s, the number of people with a diagnosis of schizophrenia has increased in many countries (Murray & Lopez, 1996).

There is a growing awareness of the need to improve the lives of people with schizophrenia. The World Health Organization (WHO) has developed a strategy for the care of people with schizophrenia, which is based on the following principles: (1) early diagnosis and treatment; (2) continuity of care; (3) a focus on the individual's needs; (4) a focus on the individual's strengths; (5) a focus on the individual's social and cultural context; and (6) a focus on the individual's recovery (WHO, 1993).

The WHO strategy has been widely adopted and has led to the development of many national and international guidelines for the care of people with schizophrenia. However, there is still a need to improve the lives of people with schizophrenia. This is because many people with schizophrenia still experience significant difficulties in their lives, such as social isolation, unemployment, and homelessness (Murray & Lopez, 1996).

One of the main reasons for these difficulties is the lack of social and community support for people with schizophrenia. This is because many people with schizophrenia are still stigmatized and discriminated against by society. This is often due to the fact that many people with schizophrenia are still seen as dangerous and unpredictable (Murray & Lopez, 1996).

Therefore, it is important to develop interventions that can help to improve the lives of people with schizophrenia. One of the most effective interventions is the development of social and community support for people with schizophrenia. This can be done through a variety of means, such as the development of self-help groups, support groups, and community centers (Murray & Lopez, 1996).

One of the most important aspects of social and community support is the development of a sense of belonging and community. This is because people with schizophrenia often feel isolated and alone. Therefore, it is important to provide them with opportunities to interact with others and to feel part of a community (Murray & Lopez, 1996).

Another important aspect of social and community support is the development of skills and abilities. This is because many people with schizophrenia have difficulty with basic life skills, such as cooking, cleaning, and budgeting. Therefore, it is important to provide them with opportunities to learn these skills and to practice them in a safe and supportive environment (Murray & Lopez, 1996).

Finally, it is important to provide people with schizophrenia with opportunities to participate in meaningful activities. This is because many people with schizophrenia have difficulty finding meaningful work or hobbies. Therefore, it is important to provide them with opportunities to engage in activities that are meaningful to them and that can help to improve their quality of life (Murray & Lopez, 1996).

In conclusion, the WHO strategy for the care of people with schizophrenia is based on the following principles: (1) early diagnosis and treatment; (2) continuity of care; (3) a focus on the individual's needs; (4) a focus on the individual's strengths; (5) a focus on the individual's social and cultural context; and (6) a focus on the individual's recovery (WHO, 1993).

Therefore, it is important to develop interventions that can help to improve the lives of people with schizophrenia. This can be done through a variety of means, such as the development of social and community support for people with schizophrenia. This can be done through a variety of means, such as the development of self-help groups, support groups, and community centers (Murray & Lopez, 1996).
